LEGEND

JACKSON'S TRACE

Andrew Jackson, the great Indian fighter who later became president of the United States, cut a trail from Talladega to Fort Williams, on the Coosa River about ten miles west of Sylacauga.

This, Fort Williams Street, was most probably a part of this trail, which was constantly retraced by Jackson and his leaders, Sam Houston, Davy Crockett, Colonel Williams and others.

Over this route they made their way to near-by Horse Shoe Bend where they broke the power of the Creek Indians, March 27, 1814. Hence our name "JACKSON'S TRACE."

HORSESHOE BEND

Located on the Tallapoosa River about 15 miles east of here is an important historical place called Horseshoe Bend. There, on March 27, 1814, General Jackson broke the power of the Creek Indians in the most significant Indian battle in the United States.

This contributed greatly to the nation's growth by eliminating the Creek Indian menace and prepared the way for the winning of the West. Also it brought Jackson sufficient prestige to enable him to gain later victories at Mobile, Pensacola and New Orleans.

These victories led to a drastic revision of the Treaty of Ghent, making it favorable and acceptable to our country; and thus ended the War of 1812. Hence our name "HORSESHOE BEND."
